1. Security labor provides the human resources necessary to implement security policies. Security forces, intelligence agencies, and other security organizations are responsible for carrying out the tasks that are necessary to protect the EU from threats such as terrorism, organized crime, and cyberattacks.
2. Security labor shapes the way that security policies are understood and defined. The experiences and perspectives of security workers can influence the way that policymakers think about security threats and the best way to respond to them.
3. Security labor can act as a political force in its own right. Security unions and other organizations can lobby policymakers for changes to security policies. They can also engage in public protests and other forms of political action.

- Increased secrecy and decreased accountability. Security agencies often operate in secret, and their activities are often exempt from public scrutiny. This can make it difficult to hold them accountable for their actions.
- Erosion of civil liberties. Security measures can sometimes infringe on civil liberties, such as the right to privacy and the right to freedom of expression.

- Increased social inequality. Security labor is often concentrated in certain regions and among certain groups of people. This can lead to increased social inequality and resentment.
